

A Personal Note from Shaving Barakth

To everyone reading this,

I've always preferred to stay behind the scenes, letting my work speak for itself. For years, I've dedicated my life to solving complex problems in technology, fintech, and blockchain. Not for recognition, but because I believe in the transformative power of innovation. I've worked quietly, often independently supporting governments and major tech companies, ensuring that what I create serves a purpose beyond profit or prestige.

Today, however, things are different. With The Code, I've built something that has the potential to change lives and not just for those already thriving but especially for those in less evolved countries where inequality is most severe. While inequality exists everywhere, even in wealthy nations, the divide is far greater in third-world countries. The Code was designed with these individuals in mind: to empower them with tools and opportunities that were previously out of reach.

I didn't create The Code to attract attention or accolades. I created it because I saw a need, a gap that could be filled with the right combination of technology and purpose. At the same time, I understand the skepticism and mistrust that many people feel after witnessing countless scams and failures in the crypto market. That's why The Code is built differently. It operates entirely on decentralized systems, relying on smart contracts within Binance's blockchain. There's no need for human intervention, no middlemen, no gatekeepers, because trust is embedded in the technology itself.

To the less fortunate who are already benefiting from this system: you are the reason The Code exists. Your stories of resilience inspire me every day. To those in third-world nations who have been overlooked by traditional systems: this is *for you. And to the experts and innovators who have supported this vision:

thank you for believing in it as much as I do.*

*I know stepping into the spotlight comes with its challenges, but if sharing this work means more people can benefit from it, then I'm willing to take that step.
This isn't about me. It's about all of us and the future we can build together.*

Thank you for your trust and support as we move forward with The Code. Let's change lives—together.

With gratitude,

Shaving Barakth

TRUST THE CODE